This was a large scale operation: 594 BTC stolen at the same time. Largest holder lost 30 BTC.

This is crazy. I had never heard of such a surgical theft of bitcoin before. All bitcoin thefts are generally someone giving away their seed from a stupid manipulation.

When I first read OP's post a few hours ago, I was like "dude probably just entered his seed wherever". But this time, the theft is very surgical. Someone exploited a flaw with coldcard. This is not your fault OP. They talk about you in the article. You will have to unite with the other victims and sue Coldcard to get compensated. I think it would be worth making a new post on this sub whose purpose is for other victims to make themselves known, so you can coordinate a group action

OK I have read everything and I have a question: When you bought the original Coldcard, HOW did you generate the seed words? You mentioned in other for granted and used it anyway?

It seems to me that your original seeds were compromised from the start. Let's say some malicious Coldcard worker had access to the hardware wallets in the Coldcard production line or something like that, somehow managed to store a bunch of original seeds hoping buyers would use them as is and retire a couple of years later, raising no personal suspicion. It seems really likely, I have no idea how the production of these wallets work, but it could have some human processing in any way, which creates breaches like that, unfortunately.

s1amage OP • 3d ago

It was generated by the coldcard. I followed BTCSessions's YouTube channel. I guess I should have used the dice method.

Really sorry this happened to you. Losing that much is brutal, especially when you were careful with hardware wallets and air-gapping. I'm glad you're in a better headspace now and that it's not the end of the world for you. The fact that you're sharing the full timeline so others can learn from it is genuinely helpful. Take care of yourself, and I hope the remaining wallet stays safe.

Coldcard acknowledging the issue be like : "Out of an abundance of caution"

When your clients just lost 594 BTC because of a mistake you made, acknowledging the issue is not "abundance of caution", it is the least you can do.

This company is a joke. Guys who use a Coldcard, make yourself a favor and buy a new hardware wallet you only used sparrow on desktop right?

(there is no sparrow wallet on mobile phones, those are all scams/malware)

Did you roll dice when setting up the coldcard for extra entropy or just use the base entropy? if so, how many rolls did you do? less then 100?

Do you know the firmware versions you were using ?

I'm sorry this happened to you.

I remember coldcard being promoted as THE hardware wallet for Bitcoin-only people since it was also open-source etc. I'm glad I never bought and used it.

This is an absolute shitshow, might be the end of coldcard as a company.

Coinkite filing for bankruptcy in 3..2..1

I'm so glad I bought the cold card mk1, it was so faulty it was basically unusable.. messaged support and their advice was to buy the mk2.

Since that day I've hated them.

Feel bad for everyone who lost money.. hopefully the thief slips up and gets caught, or returns funds, slim chance but possible.

I guess the lesson here is don't trust the entropy of any device, and don't store all your eggs in 1 basket

Looks like it is probably an issue with mk2/mk3 seed generation:

<https://x.com/i/status/2082958675975553224>

Coinkite also just issued a statement they are investigating and any users that generated their seed this way should migrate.

What if someone hacked the official website, stole the buyers info and send the buyer a compromised wallet? You buy the wallet, the hacker steals your information, sends you the compromised wallet, he waits an year and steals all the founds on the wallets. Or maybe is just an insider that switched the regular coldcards with compromised ones.

Check your credit card movements and check if the payment you did in 2025 was actually sent to the official website.
