Raises an interesting question, if they did know, and wanted to patch it... how could they release a patch that didn't automatically highlight the issue for attack? As soon as you tell users to upgrade and regen, or anyone capable sees the code diff, it'd be open season on all prior keys.

What I find particularly interesting here is who did these drains 3 years ago?

- Did an attacker know of this vulnerability and only slowly exploited it?
- Or did Coldcard users create new wallets and found somebody else's wallet?

Same way Core does it. Hide it in a refactor.

purpose of safeguarding vulnerable funds and trying to return them later.

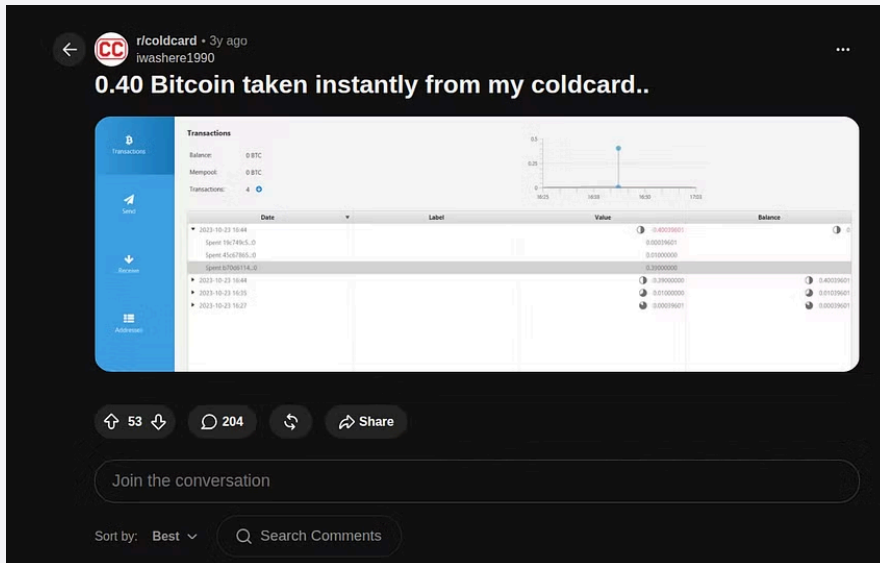

It's a bad idea for a bunch of reasons, in the current context, but maybe ColdCard would have had to do something like that.

I've been looking through a number of these this morning. I'm not sure that it's very convincing that the firmware was the problem -- it is also possible users screwed up.
